Then, all at once, Chu Jiwang began to feel he couldn't go on this way. He would not be able to achieve all that was in store for him. He had to gain some real skills.

Yes, what he needed was some solid skills. To cultivate some genuine talent. All he could rely on was his ability if he wanted to make his way in the world and better serve the people.

Navigation, running the engines, equipment maintenance—those were what you called skilled work; work you needed real ability to do. Han Zunwu and the others were all in these kinds of posts. After five years of military service, their skills must be exquisitely honed. They would have no problem finding work because they had a strong specialty. But what could he learn in guard communications? What would he do when he left? This was not something he could just ignore.

What's more, Han Zunwu and the others were sailing ships all day, blazing their way across the country—to Wuhan, Shanghai, Ningbo and Zhoushan; whatever new experiences they could desire were there to be tasted. Every time they came back from a trip, they would rave to him about the wonderful sights they had seen. Compared to this, he could not help but feel his own
